Man Protests Tyranny by Walking Across U.S. in “The Long March of Liberty”

Outdoorsman and writer Cedric C. Keith is walking “The Long March of Liberty” across the United States in protest against tyranny. As he makes his way from Washington State to Washington, DC, Cedric is collecting signatures on a petition against federal government authoritarianism that he plans to deliver to the Capitol. This petition is also available for signature at The Long March of Liberty web site: marchofliberty.com. Cedric invites liberty-minded individuals to walk any portion of the route with him.

“In an era in which the illiberal left controls schools and media like never before, the surveillance capabilities of big tech are being fused with governmental powers, and the state is everywhere elevated above the individual,” Cedric explained, “I saw a unique moment of crisis for liberty and wanted to make a great personal contribution.” He continues, “I hope this effort will inspire others to speak out against authoritarianism and join The Long March of Liberty in support of our fundamental rights and freedoms.”

Cedric began walking from the west coast of Washington State on April 1. He recently crossed into Montana and anticipates reaching the nation’s Capitol in early November. The route follows a generally northerly course, mostly along state highways, traversing portions of Washington, Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Iowa, Illinois, Ohio, West Virginia, Maryland, and Virginia.

Cedric is a blue-collar worker, an outdoorsman, and a writer. When he’s not in the forest, he resides in the Pittsburgh area. From 2007 to 2011, Cedric hiked over 4,000 miles through the whole native range of the Eastern brook trout from Georgia to New Brunswick. He chronicled this trek in his book, The Dying Fish: A Sojourn to the Source. Cedric also blogs on conservation from a libertarian perspective at thedyingfish.com.

To sign the petition and find out how to join Cedric in The Long March of Liberty, visit marchofliberty.com or @marchofliberty on Gab. You can help support Cedric’s effort by sharing this information with other liberty-minded individuals and organizations.
